

Mark Nicholson

Launching into the entertainment industry after completing a degree in Law from Monash University, Mark has grown to be an exciting and talented actor, comedian, writer, and producer.

Mark has always loved making people laugh and began attracting attention as a writer/performer in the Monash Law Comedy Revue - a live sketch comedy show - where he demonstrated his diversity, strength and range as an entertainer. His background in live sketch comedy, as well as musical and stand-up comedy, served him well in making the transition from the stage to the screen.

Mark proved his wit and comedic flair when he co-created, co-wrote and co-starred in the Green Room sketch comedy pilot filmed before a live studio audience.

Mark was ubiquitous on Australian TV during the 2012 London Olympics, in his role as the letter T in the Commonwealth Bank's Olympic CAN campaign. The character made international news as a result of a controversial stunt performed during the Games in London, as well as being adapted as internet memes.

In 2013, Mark was formative in the launch of the internet comedy channel Stepmates, which has developed a strong online following and evolved into a production company that covers all aspects of the production schedule. Collaborating with director and friend Sebastian Peart, Mark has illustrated his ability to create and perform consistent, original and viral content, with notable works including videos for the St Kilda Football Club, Bill Shorten MP and Sportsbet.com.au. Mark has delivered unique, relatable, and distinctive characters, and continues to be a key creative of Stepmates.

Mark is an animated, enthusiastic and memorable personality, who brings a professionalism and passion to every project he pursues.
