Angeline Andrews is a highly proficient and versatile character actress with an extreme eye for detail. She relishes the opportunity to transform: her career has seen her play a number of memorable characters including various sappy pantomime princesses; a young Northern wannabe-celebrity with just one silicone implant; a moronic supermarket employee; and a flesh-eating zombie!

Angeline's career began in 1999. She spent a year training at The Academy Drama School in London and then won a scholarship to the prestigious Academy of Live and Recorded Arts (ALRA).

Angeline's career has seen her perform in a variety of theatres – from UK and Australian tours; large regional venues; to a run in London's smallest professional theatre that seats just 40 people. Her screen work has taken her to various locations including a night-shoot at a large supermarket; a haunted (according to the locals!) town hall; and a zebra crossing on the busy London Strand, with perplexed and curious rush-hour commuters driving by. She has even donned a wetsuit under her costume to shoot a commercial that was set in a real waterfall whilst she had a live parrot perching on her head!

Angeline has a strong interest in writing – so much so that over a decade ago she picked up a pen and wrote her very own first play. She has now written over 30 plays to date with a number of them having been professionally produced.

Angeline left the UK in 2010 and spent just under two years living in New Zealand. She took her own one-woman play 'Typeface' to the New Zealand Fringe Festival – single-handedly producing and performing it just 10 weeks after she arrived in the country. She went on to perform in several theatre productions in Wellington and Auckland as well as appearing in TV commercials.

In 2012, Angeline arrived in Sydney where she now permanently resides and enjoys her professional acting, writing and directing career on stage, screen and in studios.
